

Social Security Benefits and Disability

Because Social Security regulations are so complex, determining which social security benefits you qualify to receive can be a challenge. To help you, here are some answers to common questions about disability benefits received through Social Security.

SSA is only for people whose disability is complete and who have been disabled (or are expected to be disabled) for one year or more, so there are no partial disability social security benefits. If you need partial disability, you will have to apply through a state or local disability program. If SSA denies you benefits on the grounds that you are not completely disabled, this will not bar you from applying for and receiving partial disability benefits from local and state disability programs.

However, you can continue to work while receiving disability social security benefits as long as you are able to work only at a low level or for short periods of time. Your total income will be taken into account by the state agency that handles your social security case. If you can still work but your maximum possible income falls below a certain amount, you can still collect disability benefits. Note that the agency will consider how much you CAN earn, not how much you DO earn: If you could earn above the minimum by changing to a different job that you are trained to do and physically capable of doing, then you will be considered ineligible for social security benefits. You will not be pushed beyond your limits and asked to do work you are not capable of doing. The state agency will consider your experience, education, medical condition, and even age when evaluating your ability to change jobs. If you need help moving to a better job that would enable you to support yourself, assistance is available.

Many applicants are confused and annoyed by their social security agents request to continue seeing doctors even after they have doctors statements that there is no available medical treatment for the applicants condition. If you are in this position, there is an explanation! First, your regular doctors may not be able to provide all of the information the state agency needs to evaluate your case. The agency will arrange for you to see a doctor who has the specialized experience or equipment necessary to complete the examination. The visit is not for treatment; it is simply part of your case evaluation.

Second, disability is not always permanent, and even untreatable conditions can improve. Regular examinations to chart the progress of your health are essential. Your health may improve enough that you can return to work, even without medical treatment.

And third, medical breakthroughs happen every year. Why let resignation steal a possible cure from you? It is a small nuisance compared to the huge lifestyle benefits you could reap. More articles Social security disability -- Orlando social security attorney -- Disability attorney -- Social security lawyer florida --

About the Author

To read more on social security disability lawyer, visit this reference.

Source: <http://sportsmans-shop.com>