

Things Your Social Security Lawyer Might Tell You

Q: Social Security says they paid me too much. What should I do next?

A: Any social security lawyer will tell you that you have a few different options when you are told that you have been overpaid. Your first option is to ask the SSA for what is called a "reconsideration." You will do this when you believe that Social Security has made a mistake in considering you an overpayment. In this case, Social Security will look over your file again. You may be required to meet with an SSA representative, in which case it is a good idea to bring a social security lawyer or advocate with you.

If you do not believe that the SSA made a mistake when they calculated your overpayment, you can ask them to waive the overpayment. When you do this, you admit that you received too much money, but request to be allowed not to pay it back. Your social security lawyer will probably suggest this course if the overpayment was due to a mistake made by the SSA.

Lastly, if you think that the overpayment was your mistake, you will generally be required to repay the overpayment. A social security lawyer will tell you that your best option is to speak to the SSA about scheduling payments. This will allow you to repay the money as you are able. Arent sure whether you should request a reconsideration, waiver, or payment schedule? Speak to a social security lawyer.

Q: Is somebody who is legally blind eligible for Social security disability?

A: According to Social Security, "legally blind" means your vision cannot be corrected to more than 20/200. And just as with most other disabilities, the legally blind are eligible for benefits in many cases. While you may want to speak with a social security lawyer about your specific case, in general you can look over the guidelines for eligibility under any other disability to determine whether you may be eligible.

In most ways, blindness is treated by the SSA like any disability. But some special benefits are set aside for the legally blind, as this condition is particularly disabling. If you are legally blind, you may want to speak to a social security lawyer about any extra benefits you may be eligible for.

Q: Ive heard I cant file for Social Security for 12 months after my disability. Is this really true?

A: No, you do not have to wait to apply. According to the Social Security Administration, an eligible disability is one that prevents you from making a sufficient income. In the "small print" it goes on to say that your disability either needs to be fatal, or to have lasted or be expected to last one year or more. Those that dont work with a social security lawyer often take this to mean they have to wait until theyve been disabled 12 months to apply. But a social security lawyer will tell you to apply right away.

See here also Social security benefits orlando -- Social security lawyer -- Orlando social security attorney --

About the Author

Similar articles on social security benefits, visit www.HillandPonton.com.

Source: <http://sportsmans-shop.com>